

I find it hard to image the burden that will be placed on small market radio stations like ours to record the entire content of a day. Most small market radio stations survive because of their commitment to serving their markets. It is hard for me to believe that we could keep our small town listening audience if we spent a lot of our breath uttering profanities in the first place. I believe that requiring recording of a full day of broadcasting is an undue hardship that would be placed on the little guy. Some of the larger market radio stations think they can get away with saying what they want for shock value or whatever reason and then hide behind a Constitutional Amendment of Free Speech. With Free Speech goes responsibility, but those who are "responsible" broadcasters are the ones being punished. That's a costly plan like stopping everyone after happy hour, because one person might have had too much to drink. I believe this is a bad idea!
